

Problem: People often struggle to break out of their routines and find the motivation to try new things. They may want to explore new activities, experiences, or situations, but staying within their comfort zone can feel easier and more familiar. This makes it difficult to introduce variety and spontaneity into everyday life.

Incorporating different types of "sidequests" across multiple categories could encourage people to step outside their routines through a playful, game-like dynamic, motivating them to try new experiences and do things differently.

Questions:

Q1: How many times per week do you feel you have free time, and nothing to do?

Q2: Are you open to the opportunity to do activities with strangers in the same situation?

Q3: What types of activities would you say bring you out of your comfort zone?

Q4: Would you be willing to propose activities?

Q5: Would you be willing to invite strangers along for the activities you propose?

Q6: Do you feel like this would be a good idea to make new friends, and why?

Q7: How much time would you be willing to invest in one of these activities?

Q8: How far would you be willing to move to partake in one of these activities?

Q9: What activities do you normally do when you have nothing else to do?

Q10: How comfortable do you feel with your actual routine?

Q11: On a scale from 1 to 10, 1 being least likely and 10 being most likely, how likely are you to check for activities posted on your phone when you have free time?

Q12: What would you say is the hardest part about breaking away from your routine?

R1: 8-12 hours a week

R2: Yes, as long as there is a safety guarantee

R3: Exploring new places, try a new sport, try a new boardgame, attending live events.

R4: Yes

R5: Yes, as long as there is a safety guarantee

R6: Yes, because most of the time the most interesting people you meet are not in the places you spend the most time.

R7: 2-3 hours

R8: No more than 8km

R9: Play guitar, reading, watching tv, taking a walk/hike

R10: 8/10, because even though I like the things I usually do I feel like at this point in my life I should be trying new things

R11: 9/10

R12: The hardest part about breaking my routine is finding people to do it with.

Summary:

The respondent is a 7th semester biology student, from out of town who lives alone. Who spends most of his time doing school work, and enjoys spending his free time doing introverted activities.

He's dealing with a lack of outgoing activities, and he has difficulty finding opportunities to socialize with new people, even though he is willing to do it. He stated "I would like to meet new people and make new friends before my university experience is over and it's too late".

His last experience breaking out from his comfort zone was 4 months ago when he participated in a ping pong tournament, he was out on the first stage of the tournament and didn't talk with anyone.

He seems excited and eager to try a solution to his problem, and the proposed solution rings a bell on him.

What: During his day-to-day life he struggles to break out of his routine and can't find activities to do so. His social life is lacking human interaction, and he feels like doing new activities would help him meet new people.

How: He tries going to activities and reunions people from the university invites him, but people that attend those activities usually do it in groups and tend not to integrate new people, he tries events outside university but finds it difficult to cold approach strangers to talk to.

Why: None of his friends are in the university he attends and he doesn't have any family in the city, so outside university he doesn't have much human interaction.

Who: People who struggle to find activities to get out of their comfort zones and find meeting new people hard. People who are bored, and need new plans to do during their free time.